Q: Budget-friendly Linux virtualization I'm planning to buy a Windows 7 workstation (or Windows 7 Ultimate and install VMWare ESX Server or something else), but I'd like to run Linux distros on it as well. I'm looking for a low-cost virtualization software for Linux, and I don't have many of the traditional platforms (including x86-compatible PowerPC and ARM, though an alternative ARM processor might be worth looking into). What I'm looking for is something between the low-end free VMWare ESXi (bare-metal virtualization) and the high-end paid VMWare ESXi. A: For Linux, I'd highly recommend using either VirtualBox or VMware ESXi. The former is free and open-source, while the latter is freeware and closed-source. Both are actively developed, stable, and have a low resource footprint, so for most people it's just a matter of finding the right version for your needs. In the wake of Saturday's mass shooting in Las Vegas, in which 59 people were killed and more than 527 injured, the Republican National Committee, focusing on the prospects for the 2018 midterm elections, sent an email to the party's affiliates urging grassroots GOP activists to hold town halls. "Whether it's a tough primary or a difficult general election, we need to be in full-force and on the ground to make sure that we not only win the White House but also the Senate and House," RNC Chairwoman Ronna McDaniel wrote. On Sunday, Trump tweeted support for "National @GOPTownHall," drawing on his previous attempts to use unbridled party activism to overcome Democratic opposition on health care and other issues. But after a weekend in which Republicans also faced accusations of sexism against the president and his supporters, the email appeared to be targeting something closer to the general election campaign. Other Republicans also took advantage of the weekend tragedy to urge their supporters to attend and speak at political events. Former Trump campaign manager Corey Lewandowski told "Fox News Sunday" that the president's "empowering" supporters to get out in public and let their presence speak was important in an election year that will be characterized by opposition to the president. "We are standing for the principles of patriotism, and we're standing for the principles of the
