substantial costs related to the disorder and its treatment. Few estimates of the magnitude of these costs are available, and none are available for the United States. To estimate the total cost of RA in the United States in 1994, we measured the national economic burden of RA. The burden of RA in 1994 was measured by estimating the total costs attributable to different components of RA (arthritis, acute and long-term costs), and by estimating the dollars associated with the full economic impact of RA (disease activity, functional status, work productivity, and community-related costs). The costs were derived from published data, such as national or regional sources, the Cost of Illness Project, the US Bureau of the Census, the Patient Oriented Data Dictionary (in-patient, outpatient, and physician costs), and the National Center for Health Statistics' National Hospital Discharge Survey (in-hospital costs). We estimated the average total yearly cost of RA, including direct costs and indirect costs. The costs were extrapolated to 1994 dollars using inflation factors that reflect the most recent time intervals. We estimated that in 1994, the total societal cost of RA was $5.2 billion, or $7,100 per patient. Of this, $4.4 billion was attributable to the direct costs of RA, which include the cost of physician visits, hospitalizations, medications, and diagnostic tests. The total direct cost of RA was $1.6 billion, or $2,300 per patient. In 1994, RA-related costs were $3.3 billion, or $4,700 per patient. This was due to $1.8 billion in indirect costs. The average total yearly cost of RA among individuals with the disease was estimated to be $7,100. RA-related costs were an average of $4,700 per patient.Q:
