Israel's Strategic Affairs Minister Gilad Erdan has said that the regime intends to expand its missile defence system, and will also sell this technology to other countries, including Iran. The comments were made during an interview with the Jerusalem Post in which he boasted that a report on missile defence "was ready to be distributed to the media." "According to our research, up to 70 Israeli companies have produced some 40-50 different types of missiles and rockets in the last 15 years," Erdan said, referring to the Kadima government. He went on to say that the future of the country was "in missiles." "Many parts of the defence budget are spent on this," the minister continued. Erdan also remarked that both Iran and Syria are intent on acquiring the missile defence system. He explained that "over the past few years, Israel has cooperated with other countries to develop this missile defence system, including the United States, France, the UK and the Czech Republic." "We began working together on this 16 years ago," he added. "Of course, we don't want to do this alone," Erdan admitted. "We need to work together, but if you ask any Israeli, he will tell you that Israel is interested in this." And according to Erdan, Israel would like to work on the development of the missile defence system with other countries, but is not in a position to do so alone. "At the moment, we don't have any good offers for working together with other countries, but this shouldn't be a problem. This is a problem that was created by Iran," he added. Israel has recently revealed plans to build a missile defence system for Israel's borders with Lebanon and Syria, in addition to the southern borders with Gaza and Egypt, in an effort to protect the country from hostile missile attacks. The U.S. military has no idea what's going on with its most important commercial satellite. Over the weekend, a Pentagon spokesperson acknowledged to CNN that the US military's most-powerful communications satellite, referred to as the "bread and butter" of its space operations, began experiencing an "anomalous change" in orbit, by as much as 38 feet. The US Strategic Command (STRATCOM) operates the satellite, and is very responsible for it. The government source said it's safe to assume that no one — including STRATCOM — knows why this problem happened or how to solve it. An aerospace firm contracted by the US government to service the satellite still has no idea what's going on, or what could be causing the problem. That's what is worrying US military leaders, as they prepare for possible engagement with Russia or another country. "There is a real concern that the loss of this [communications] capability would have a major impact on our ability to communicate," a senior defense official told CNN. As a result, STRATCOM may try to replicate the old orbit or send the satellite somewhere else to use. "Now we're talking about moving an orbital platform that has just a very narrow window for how much space debris you're going to have at a given orbit. Now you've got to put that into a highly contested environment," the official said. "We just don't know how to deal with that problem," the official said. Lockheed Martin owns the satellite. Satellite experts told CBC News the likelihood of a satellite encounter is very low. But, "the longer it's in that bad orbit, the greater the chance of one of these events happens." 'Matter of national security' A spokesperson from the Department of Defence says the government has no comment on the issue. But Mike Liston, the vice-president of communications for Lockheed Martin Space Systems, says only the Air Force could tell us what's happening. This satellite is under STRATCOM's command, and only the USAF would know what's going on, Liston said in an email. Liston says it's a commercial matter. "I'll tell you that the folks that we contract with are the experts. They know exactly what it is. We are just contracted to operate the systems. It's really not our call on whether we move it or how we move it."

How to Play: Discover the origins of an ancient, forgotten civilization. The Elven people have long since left the green mountains to hunt other prey, and their once glorious capital, The Elven Queen, has long since been abandoned and left to decay. And yet, in these times, a new threat has arisen. In the place of the vanished Elven people a band of roving barbarians has settled, with weapons and horses at their disposal. It is up to you, as a member of the mysterious elf-like Drow race, to
