Budgetary Fiscal Bureau The Fiscal Bureau of the Treasury or Fiscal Bureau of the Treasury, was one of the three bureaus of the United States Treasury that were established during the American Civil War, the other two being the Commodity and Revenue Bureau and the Mint Bureau. It was established on February 22, 1862 with the creation of the Department of the Treasury, and operated under the Treasury until abolished on August 31, 1877. It was created by the 2nd United States Congress, which passed the bill for the creation of the Bureau on February 22, 1862, and was headed by Chief Clerk and Clerk of the Treasury Simon Cameron. The Bureau was abolished by the 6th United States Congress (which passed the bill for its abolition on August 31, 1877) during the Hayes-Tilden Compromise.

Organization and functions The Fiscal Bureau was responsible for tracking and controlling the U.S. national debt, and carried out the functions that were formerly performed by the superintendent of public accounts. Prior to the division of the national debt into parts of special taxation and of general taxation, the superintendent of accounts calculated the cost of debt service in his annual report to Congress, which was passed by Congress and then submitted to the president for approval. This report would give the president the number of bonds to purchase, the cost of the bonds, and the amount of interest payable each month by the federal government. If the president decided not to purchase that number of bonds, he would return bff6bb2d33
