In the meantime, she must live with the humiliation of a no deal Brexit by no fault of her own. And she has no choice but to keep some sort of customs union. We had Brexit-backing MPs, Tory MPs, including the new Brexit Secretary, conceding they would like to have no deal. So the way ahead was clear: Britain must negotiate its way back into a customs union with the EU on the basis of being bound by EC rules. (Image: Reuters) There was a lack of realism in the UK. It was all based on a false premise: that Labour could be persuaded to vote for a deal with a referendum to be held afterwards. It was a mistake. It was possible that Labour would vote for a deal but in so doing it would accept that Britain could leave without a deal. It would have been a disaster for the country. Labour was already on board with Labour MPs voting against it, and those Labour backbenchers we can fairly assume would prefer a no deal, but Labour ultimately opposed the deal. We can't go back and say we told you so. We had no choice. We had to tell voters that Brexit is a disastrous project for them. Our only line was: don't vote for a referendum that is to be held after the deal is agreed. (Image: Getty Images Europe) If you can't give up a referendum, you can't have a deal. It would be unworkable in any circumstance. You couldn't do it. And when the referendum came, we had a Conservative government, a government I didn't have a vote in, that I wasn't elected to govern, that I didn't want to be in. It was a disaster for them. And now they're taking over the country. It had to happen. There was no alternative.
