Hemp (Cannabis sativa) seeds are grown in the field, sown, then cultivated or grafted. The yields are very high. They can be cultivated on grasslands, fields, garden soils, in all conditions, but especially on sandy or clayey soils. Hemp is found in the three parts of the world (Europe, Asia, Africa): the seeds are the same for all of them. Cannabis sativa also known as Cannabis as a marijuana, hashish, hash oil, or simply cannabis, is one of the oldest known psychoactive plants,[1] and Cannabis is the plant name of a group of species that all produce tetrahydrocannabinol (THC), the main psychoactive compound in cannabis. The cannabis plant contains many compounds beyond THC that are important to the human body, especially the endocannabinoid system. Until about 2008, the most common form of marijuana was flowers, which contain few cannabinoids, whereas leaves and stems contained more cannabinoids. Today, most people smoke weed from pre-rolled joints containing mostly stems and leaves. There are also several indoor varieties which only contain the THC and CBD by themselves. These varieties produce a stronger high and can be easier to smoke. In the 1970s, hemp seeds were found to contain up to 10 times more of the active ingredient than the flowers. Today, hemp seeds contain about 25% to 50% of the cannabinoids found in the flowers. History
